With Human Quality in mind, I have constantly and passionately attended to and developed my activity as an entrepreneur and as a man. I believe in this today more than ever.

And today more than ever I believe that man's future can be bright. It's just waiting for man to imagine and seize it. Socrates, in his extraordinary wisdom, knew that action is the fruit of knowledge.

Knowing how to seize the beauty of tomorrow is knowing how to safeguard it.

Knowing through experience and the words of the wise. The Solomeo School was created for this very reason.

It is the fruit of a neo-humanistic ideal that I have nurtured in my dreams for years: to do everything possible so that our children, who are often discouraged, see a world that, for them, is still new – a world of things they've yet to know.

*In the traditions of their fathers lie the reasons for their futures. Keeping traditional values alive, or where necessary bringing them back, making them current and passing them onto future generations allows everyone to build with their own hands and their own soul. Throughout the years I have known many men with knowledge who lacked a good soul. They were useless men, trees without fruit. This, then, will be the identity of the Solomeo School: to learn with reason and heart to be active and fruitful. Its motto could be In corde intellĕgo.*

On one hand, it will teach practical and traditional trades such as textiles, agriculture and gardening, masonry and metalwork by those who know and love their work; on the other, it will feed the soul and bring awareness to human values: above all, art as an aesthetic representation of reality and the spiritual foundation of all knowledge.

This idea was also dreamed up by the great visionary John Ruskin in the 19th century, during the Industrial Revolution.

If there exists an example in history which, although not a model for our school, can help us better understand our philosophical identity, it would be that of Englishman William Morris' Arts and Crafts movement.

Together with John Ruskin, William Morris founded the Arts and Crafts movement with the specific aim of challenging the depersonalisation brought on by Victorian-era industry and returning man back to his natural state as an artist and creator.

The movement, driven by courageous men fighting against the industrial culture of the time, strongly supported the return of craftsmanship and manual work to give craftsmen back their rank as artists.

According to Morris' philosophy, the movement also encouraged the rebirth of craftsmanship in its more traditional forms. William Morris' Arts and Crafts movement was more than just a simple, local experience.

It was a true philosophy which, at the time, led to the creation of many arts and crafts schools that brought attention to the rebirth of craftsmanship connected to modern manual production and lay down the basic principles of modern design.

William Morris' experience was also preceded by illustrious historical figures such as Lorenzo the Magnificent who, in his garden at San Marco in Florence, an extraordinary place of beauty, nature and culture – a garden that had been embellished by hundreds of classic and modern works, transforming it into a real outdoor museum – welcomed and supported young talent, keeping them in contact with art and helping them develop their natural talent. Among these young talents was Michelangelo who created his first magnificent works at San Marco. Times have changed and history does not repeat itself, but ideals live on and the Solomeo School, beyond immediate results, dreams of contributing to bringing man's spirit back to its natural state, because, in the words of John Ruskin,

“only by learning art will you find that, at the end, all beautiful things are also necessary.”

And inasmuch as they are necessary, they are real.

Quite simply and beautifully put, art is defined as the aesthetic representation of human experience.

We could also add that art is often an anticipation of the future in science, morale and politics. It's the sister of philosophy, the instinctive, the immediate and the immense. Apply art – use art. History teaches us that not everybody can be an artist. But we can all benefit from art. It doesn't matter if it's ancient, modern or contemporary. Every time has its art, but when it is true, art remains so for an eternity. That is how vast the art world is, and how vast the choice of artistic forms that we have for our pleasure, our soul and our humanistic development. Alexander the Great is known in history as a commander, perhaps the most famous in history. He was an arms expert, coarse, courageous, fearless and a fine strategist.

But among his teachers (soldiers, blacksmiths, farriers) there was a philosopher, one of the greatest in history: Aristotle. Aristotle had been assigned to him by his father Philip. Aristotle's father, King Philip, had perfectly understood and lovingly followed his son's education. He understood that without feeding the soul any practical teaching is missing something, it's imperfect. So it took a philosopher to train a warrior. It is extraordinarily simply, extraordinarily necessary and extraordinarily beautiful. Man is an intimate combination of soul, mind and body. This is man's natural state. In this state lays the highest concept of humanity, and humanity is what we should all aspire to in our lives, for ourselves and for others, as individuals and as a society. For this reason the Solomeo School teaches and practises the trades, which are a special art form applied to craftsmanship, and teaches how to use art to feed the spirit. The two things aren't separate, because a craftsman mirrors his work in the beauty of the soul. This is why during the Autumn at Solomeo when the landscape is rich with colour and perfume, conversations are held about art as well as history and philosophy, for the close connections that link these cultural values. Matter and spirit are paradoxically linked by a reciprocal relationship, in the simple sense that one of the two, individually, is useful for the other: learning a trade ennobles the soul, but ennobling the soul improves the learning of a trade. These two aspects of knowledge, integrated with one another, lead to an amazing result, to a felix man. A man who faces life aware of all its beauty, its strength, and the infinite possibilities it can offer to each and every one of us provided that we are ready to receive this precious thing. There are no exclusions, everybody can accept life and all its joys. But not everybody is aware of their strength, their identity and their freedom: and if it is often difficult for somebody to be 'born' into their new life, it doesn't depend on their make-up. No men or women are excluded from the fullness of life.

SCHOOL OF TRADES

Socrates compared himself, in his role as a philosopher, to a midwife: and what a beautiful image. Maieutics. Dialogue helps man to ‘give birth’ to his ideas and his extraordinary abilities. This is a practical and convincing use of philosophy and this, in fact, should be the philosophy: love for the knowledge that wants to do good for man. And what is dialogue, if not the highest form of schooling? Weren’t the first schools the dialogues that the first classic Greek philosophers carried out in the gardens near Athens? And so the Solomeo School, using an ancient model but aware of its modesty compared to the great past, wants to be above all, dialogue: dialogue that concerns and goes beyond the subject matter. A dialogue that speaks to the eyes and the hands but also to the heart and soul so that the two natures of man can be reunited, almost in a sort of resurrection between body and soul, to let the creative strength and the joy of living in each and every one of us shine through, as is it often just hidden. The theatre, the library, the Academy: the arts. The arts which, as compared to the trades that are taught to be practised, are taught to be appreciated and to cultivate our soul. A life isn't lived to the full if we are not aware of the beauty we have inherited, and only then do we feel the ethical duty to pass this onto future generations. The soul of guardians. Each one of us, as much as we wish and are able to do, are guardians of a large or small part of tradition, of some asset in our life, of our humanity. But the ethical action is always the same. Being a guardian is the maximum expression of nobility of soul, an awareness that art is the main pathway and, more thrillingly, to love the things in life and to appreciate the greatness of the guardian figure. The great men of the past invented a new social figure called the ‘eternal commensal’. Who was this commensal? Who could have inspired this unusual role? It was the Medici family in Florence who, in the XVI century, first invented the concept and role of eternal commensal. It was a role created specially for Giorgio Vasari, one of the great men of the Renaissance: a scholar, artist and historian. To gain a better insight into his level of sophistication we look to his paintings in the Palazzo Vecchio in Florence, or read his extraordinary and colossal work on the lives of artists. Knowing a man like Vasari was an immense joy. He was a pleasure to listen to and learn from. And so he was an eternal commensal, always invited to dine with the signore that had named him such. He could turn up when he wished. His place at the table was always set. The Medici family knew that the pleasure of listening to Vasari coincided with the pleasure of knowing him. And so what was created during these great moments? What took shape? What was the meaning of all this, if not a special form of school, the best possible school, a school that fed the soul as well as the body? Another school, completely different but no less fruitful, was the one that Rousseau imagined for his son Emile. The significance of this 'second nature' school was in fact to criticise society: the falsities and corrosive abilities of society at the time.

SCHOOL OF ARTS

Maintaining the innocence of childhood. A fine concept. Antoine de Saint-Exupéry was also aware of this concept; beauty was the preface of Le Petit Prince, which was dedicated to his (adult) friend: I seek forgiveness from the children for having dedicated this book to an adult. I have a serious excuse: this adult is my best friend in the whole world. I also have a second excuse: this adult can understand everything, even books for children. ... And if these excuses aren't enough, I will dedicate this book to the child this great person once was. All adults were children once (but few remember this). The young people that learn at the Solomeo School should see their eternal commensal in themselves, but must also be children of Rousseau or Saint-Exupéry. Pope Francis also says this often. Maintain the enthusiasm and innocence of childhood. Students should imagine that the physical place where they learn is not just for acquiring practical or technical knowledge, but something more. This something more is the art of theatre, music, literature, history and philosophy, and all this can be found in Solomeo. These are the activities that liven up the theatre, they are the reason for the Aureliana Neo-Humanistic Library, they form the basis of the programme of conversations that the Solomeo Academy organises every year where everything is discussed, including classic art, philosophy, history and current affairs. These activities are the other side of the school. If today the capitalism that we have inherited comes into difficulty it is because the last century left industry for finance. Profit at all costs clashes with people, because people are a limit to freedom, which is in fact essential for the market. It is entirely logical, then, that man is punished for his nature: but capitalism without men will not last long. It is truly extraordinary that these values, family values, devotion to work, loyalty, the capacity for anticipation - in one word, the ideals - were the cornerstones of the philosophical and economic theory of Adam Smith, the father of liberalism. Adam Smith arrived at The Wealth of Nations (1776) through The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759). What we have inherited and what we experience today is no longer his capitalism, because it is the careless capitalism of men. In Solomeo we have created something that can be called humanistic capitalism and for this reason we are considered innovators. But we looked to our past, and if we are innovators we are so because we knew how to look to the past and into the future. Peter Pan tried to convince his friends that in order to fly you just had to wish you could, but faced with failures to include flying, we need to dust our children with gold dust. This gold dust, inasmuch as it is possible, is the same gold dust we want to dust over the Solomeo School.

ACTIVE COUTURE

Luxury meets sporty style: craftsmanship is expressed through high-tech processes and shapes defined by the clever use of materials. A mix of modern techniques and traditional luxury in which the glamorous world of femininity and the active world of sports meet.

The shapes are geometric, from boxy, t-shape, square and trapeze to kimono, moving from the East to the West for daily wear that is rich in overlapping, multicultural influences.

Major colour effects add zest to the collection for a graphic effect in which alterations of dark and light colours are contrasted in combinations with touches that are intense yet not extreme.

Technology comes into play and brings something new to traditional artisan techniques: knitwear becomes embossed, enriched with relief floral designs thanks to a sophisticated print technique, while the bonded technique designs graphic elements, flowers and shapes with a particularly unique filled embroidery.

Inspiration starts with the world of sports and continues on to the rare universe of couture.

And so silks replace acetates, contrasting colours create graphic effect looks and sportswear shapes become active couture.
